

field notes

iris yi-tyng lin

A site-responsive research proposal
image sheet for Nakanojo Biennale 2027

I arrive not with a predetermined work, but with a method.

During my time in Nakanojo, encounters with the local landscape, plants, materials, and everyday life will gradually shape the research. The resulting work will take the form of a sensory installation. Depending on what emerges through the research, materials such as locally sourced plants or textiles may be translated into spatial elements that invite visitors to experience the site through multiple senses and discover new points of access to place.

Encounter

something calls for attention.

Sensing

perception begins.

Collecting Traces

gathering fragments.

Translation

turning experiences into form.

Interpretation

creating new points of access.

site-responsive installation

